Councilor Rich Dell Isola lines up votes to be Council President

By Seth Daniel

In year that will be monumental for Everett City government, City Councilor Rich Dell Isola has received the votes from his colleagues to be the leader of the City Council in this coming, historic year for the city.

Dell Isola has been rumored for weeks to have secured the votes over some challenges from Councilor Wayne Matewsky and a few others, and this week he did confirm that he had the votes in line to be president when the Council casts their choices on Jan. 7.

"I do have the votes and I'm excited to serve as president," he said last week. "It's going to be an exciting year for the city and a challenging year as well. The casino is going to be opening up and there are a lot of businesses that want to come into our city. We have to be very aware about what we allow in. We don't want to choke the City up with condos all over the place. We have to be watching what's going on...What we invite in during 2019 is going to have a result on 2020 and 2021. Wynn is doing great, but we have to keep an eye on what other things want to develop down there."

Dell Isola, 58, has spent eight years on the City Council, and works in the gas division of Eversource in Somerville as his day job. A

Council, state law at odds with changes to the habitability ordinance

By Seth Daniel

The Everett City Council and state law continue to be at odds in the Council's quest to reform the habitability inspection ordinance.

Once again at the Dec. 26 meeting, the Council tried to find a happy medium with inspection reform and the rights of landlords, but ended up sending it to the City Solicitor for another review.

The issue has been batted about since May, with the chief sponsor being Councilor Michael Marchese, who has said many landlords are getting penalized during inspections when tenants bring up separate issues.

Allying with him at the Weds., Dec. 26, Council meeting was Councilor Fred Capone, and the two councilors discussed how to narrow down inspections with City Attorney Keith Slattery for 90 minutes.

The issue, for the most part, is that stories have surfaced over the last year that there allegedly has been some liberty taken with the seven-year-old habitability ordinance. Chief among those liberties was that inspectors were going to inspect vacant units before rental, and tenants in other units were bringing up separate and unrelated issues. Those extra

From Fish Kills, to School Finances to one last call on Oliver Street, the City of Everett was a lively place in 2018. Above, The last Oliver Street Block Party took place on July 4 in its 30th year. Organizers said it was time to call it quits. The party has drawn current and former neighbors together for decades.

Thousands of fish washed up in August at a cover on the Mystic River near the Gateway Mall. More than 30,000 fish died in a massive fish kill that was caused by a sudden lack of oxygen due to high water temperatures.

Concerned teachers worried about their fate in Everett at a School Committee meeting in the spring. The issue of school finances and funding was a huge issue all through 2018.

2018 YEAR IN REVIEW

A year of major changes and challenges

By Seth Daniel

The year of 2018 in Everett will go down as one that started rather tamely, but progressed and ended with a great deal of turmoil and tension throughout the City.

While the face of the city has changed dramatically with new investment and new excitement for property here, it has also seen many larger than life figures toppled suddenly. When 2018 started, Wynn CEO Steve Wynn and Everett Supt. Fred Foresteire were both at the head of their organizations and at the tops of their careers. By the end of 2018, both men were no longer associated with those organizations and things had turned in a much different direction.

That said, many fun and exciting times were had, including wonderful celebrations that seemed to up the ante on some great times had in 2017.

In all, 2018 for Everett was a year of extreme ups and downs, and a year with a great eye towards 2019 – which is expected to be an unprecedented and historic year for the city as the casino opens and investment pours in.

Here are the top five stories of the year, with several honorable mentions included below as well.

1. Wynn CEO Steve Wynn seemed to be in control of his company and the project in Everett until late January, when he was accused of sexual misconduct in a Wall Street Journal report. The allegations quickly gathered steam, and by February Wynn had resigned from the company and the license for the Everett casino was in jeopardy and the project to be moving forward "at risk." The new CEO became Matt Maddox and the company saw huge amounts of turnover throughout the year. By the end of 2018, the license for the Everett site was still in limbo and an investigation into the matter still had yet to be revealed – having been delayed for months.

2. Supt. Fred Foresteire had been in charge of the Everett Public Schools for decades, and had spent 52 years in the system in total. He was a larger-than-life figure in Everett and made sure everything was

City officials say talk of Wellness Center settlement is fake news

By Seth Daniel

If President Donald Trump were to visit Everett, at least according to City administration officials, he would call the story repeatedly reported in a local newsletter about a $300,000 settlement for a Wellness Center employee fake news.

The local newsletter in Everett has been reporting for many months that an employee of the Wellness Center was harassed this year, and that a $300,000 settlement had been negotiated personally in the case by Mayor Carlo DeMaria – a settlement that the newsletter has said is secret and part of a cover up.

In more than a few ways, that was deemed a lie at the Dec. 26 meeting.

"You're saying this $300,000 settlement doesn't exist," said Councilor Michael Marchese during the meeting on Dec. 26.

"It does not exist," said City Attorney Keith Slattery. "The story is not true in any way shape or form...There is no truth to it whatsoever. There are no negotiations. There are no settlement amounts. The mayor is not ready to take any action on anything. In fact, there are no claims with the City, the MCAD or the Superior Court."

Added Mayoral Chief of Staff Kevin O'Donnell, "The $300,000 figure is a complete falsehood. No discussions of that figure – or any other figure – have been discussed."

Slattery told the Council that there was a claim made of harassment at the Wellness Center by an employee this year. It was investigated, in-

School Committee to reconvene today, Jan. 2, for special meeting

By Seth Daniel

The School Committee suddenly cancelled a special meeting on Dec. 26 that included three hot topics on the sexual harassment saga that has gripped the School Department, and will instead have that meeting today, Jan. 2, at 6:30 p.m.

There is very little that is different on the agenda for the three items to be discussed on Jan. 2., except that – as opposed to the Dec. 26 agenda – there are no names of people invited to the executive sessions.

Previously, the names of Interim Supt. Janice Gauthier, School Committee Attorney Robert Galvin, former Supt. Fred Foresteire, Asst. Supts. Charlie Obremski and Kevin Shaw and Clerk Gina Grande were listed as invited participants.

They are not listed on the current agenda.

Sources said the meeting would likely be very eventful, but that it would all take place behind closed doors in executive session due to pending litigation and strategy for that litigation.

So far, there are two documented cases of sexual harassment against Foresteire and the School Department, with both women being represented by Boston Attorney Tara Swartz. However, other cases have been discussed routinely as possibly going forward.

Meanwhile, many are wondering about whether or not Interim Supt. Janice Gauthier, named by the School Committee Dec. 17, will be able to last in the position. Some have said there are others in contention and that the School Committee could be considering other names for the spot.

The names of multiple internal candidates have come up, and that is likely what will be discussed behind closed doors during the first item on the executive session agenda.

One name that is said to be considered, but in essence is not being considered, is Dr. Omar Easy.

Easy attended Everett Public Schools and worked in the administration for several years before transferring to a position in Everett City Hall two years ago.

always nothing short of perfect. But that tight ship came crashing down suddenly, and unexpectedly, in December when he was accused of sexual harassment. He retired from his position on Dec. 20, and multiple investigations into the matter are still ongoing.

3. School Finances were a major issue all year long. Starting in February, the School Department began to identify that it would be short several million dollars this year in its budget. Later, school officials indicated they would have to lay off numerous educators to absorb the shortfall. With the City stepping in and agreeing to pay several million dollars in aid after a hugely contentious meeting at City Hall in the spring, the problem seemed to be resolved. However, the budget for the new school year was also marred with tension between City Hall and the School Department. In the fall, that tension brought in Sen. Sal DiDomenico when a state budget allocation of $2.5 million became a source of controversy between City Hall and the School Department.

4. The September 4 Primary Election. The state representative race captured the attention of every savvy Everett resident throughout the summer and early fall, with three viable candidates contending for the seat including Rep.

The installation of the Hero Square sign for Christopher Brienza was a big moment in 2018. Brienza was killed in Florida during an accident while serving in the Navy.

Joe McGonagle, Gerly Adrien and Steve ‘Stat’ Smith. Residents were glued to the race throughout several debates and forums in the summer, including a packed house at the library for a forum between all three candidates. McGonagle ends up beating Adrien with 46 percent of the vote to her 39 percent, while Smith was not a factor. The biggest headline of the night, however, was when Boston City Councilor Ayan-na Pressley upset sitting Congressman Michael Capuano decidedly. Capuano had campaigned hugely in Everett, and won here with 65 percent of the vote. However, a strong Boston turnout propelled Pressley to an big win.

5. Down the Line Disappears. Though few notice, The Line neighborhood disappears slowly, but suddenly, in 2018 as the Encore Boston Harbor

The City Council toured the Wynn/Encore construction site over the summer, one of many groups to take in the progress on the casino, which moved at lightning pace throughout 2018.

Village Fest was another hit in 2018, and was highlighted by 1990s rock icon Sugar Ray (Mark McGrath).

Mayor Carlo DeMaria and Sen. Sal DiDomenico sharing a moment... In the political world, tensions grew during 2018 over school funding and other issues where before things weren't quite as intense.

The return of the Independence Day children races was a highlight in the summer, also running alongside a water melon eating contest. The two were sponsored by the City Council ahead of the City's large festivities.

The Encore Boston Harbor casino was fully lit up for the first time in early December, striking an amazing resemblance to the early renderings of the project.

project continued to buy up property adjacent to its casino site for parking and future related development projects. What once was a mix of homes and industry in a unique neighborhood near the industrial waterfront disappeared almost completely in 2018. Now, most of the streets that made up The Line have been transformed into a construction parking lot. It was a part of Everett that many thought little of prior to Encore, though several prominent Everett residents grew up ‘Down the Line’ over the years.

Everett Independence Day festivities were a huge hit with the public, and residents were treated to fireworks at Glendale Park for the second year in a row.

Honorable Mentions:

- Gov. Charlie Baker attends the inaugural ceremony for Mayor Carlo DeMaria, the City Council and the School Committee in January – congratulating the Everett contingent and sticking around for the entire ceremony. Mayor DeMaria makes a very forward-looking address and calls for a new City-owned transportation system and a new stadium at 7-acre park on the Malden River.

School Supt. Fred Foresteire appeared at the microphone for most of the year calling for enhanced school finances, but he ended the year surprisingly, retiring suddenly in the wake of sexual harassment claims against him.

- A bomb cyclone hits Everett and the surrounding region on Jan. 4 and drops 13.5 inches of snow in a matter of hours. It was a story that became regional and made the national news as well.

- Long-time football coach John DiBiasi stuns the city when, after retiring a month earlier in Everett, he accepts a job as head coach of the Catholic Memorial football team on Jan. 15. Later in the winter, he records his 500th win in basketball at Everett. Meanwhile, the School Department announces that Theluxon Pierre will take over as football coach, and Stanley Chamblain will be the new basketball coach.

- The Pope John Tigers captured the attention of anyone who likes basketball when they ran and ran and ran to a Division 4 State Championship on March 17, bearing Maynard at Springfield College 89-57. In the fall, the reconstructed Pope John football team made a march to the Super Bowl, but fell short at Gillette Stadium, losing to St. Bernard’s 46-35.

- The Everett High School Crimson Tide football team gets the 800th win in the history of the program when it travels to Xaverian High in the opening game and beats them quite easily on Sept. 7. The Tide were led all year by superstar Mike Sainristil, who eventually signed to play football with the University of Michigan.

- Everett Sgt. Larry Jedry received the state Hanna Award for bravery in September at the State House from Gov. Charlie Baker. He was honored for his bravery in confronting an armed man in Everett Square in October 2017.

- With an air of controversy, the Homecoming Parade is cancelled in October due to the large expense of the parade and budget shortfalls. The City declines to pay the $100,000 cost for the parade, but instead hosts a Homecoming Celebration at Glendale Park the night before. It was the first time in decades that there wasn’t a homecoming parade in Everett.

- Village Fest draws thousands once again and became a September staple in the Greater Boston area with entertainment, games and breweries coming together for a fun time. This year, 1990s icon Sugar Ray (Mark McGrath) highlighted the show and brought smiles to numerous nostalgic fans.

- Sen. Sal DiDomenico is involved in a heated and intense bid for the office of Senate President over several months, but in the summer comes up just short in getting the votes necessary to prevail. Sen. President Karen Spilka gets the nod instead, but DiDomenico remains the assistant majority leader and ends up coming out of the battle in a very good position of leadership.

- Firefighter Susan Pipitone-Braleay passes away from occupational cancer over the summer, part of a very challenging year for the Fire Department – which saw two sudden deaths and a severe fire-related injury to its membership. For Pipitone-Braleay, firefighters from Everett and beyond gather for her wake and funeral on Aug. 3 and 4. She was the first woman on the contingent and was a driver for Engine 1.

- As the City has prospered, it has also become known for its willingness to try anything and be an innovator. That has been very obvious when it comes to public transportation and the Everett Bus Rapid Transit program. At no time was that more visible than on Aug. 14 when the bus stops in Everett Square were hit with a “Flower Bomb.” Both stops were decorated elaborately with all kinds of flowers and greenery, drawing many curious onlookers, drawing tons of media, and bringing smiles to the faces of riders.

- The National Grid gas worker lockout debuts in June in Everett in a whacky way as the company builds a strange “back door” entrance and exit through the fence of their property and onto Wyllis Avenue – having to cross a gas line and the bike path to get there. It draws the ire of locked out workers and Mayor Carlo DeMaria as well. The lockout continues for the rest of the year and workers – including several Everett residents – are still in flux.

A fire on Morris Street in July took the city by storm as two firefighters were seriously injured in the blaze. Capt. Scott Dalrymple was the more seriously injured jake, and he is still recovering from his injuries.

Ayanna Pressley’s victory against Congressman Mike Capuano in September shocked everyone.

The Everett Crimson Tide Marching Band was invited to Washington D.C. for the National Memorial Day Parade. It was a major first for the marching band, and many from Everett accompanied them.

Workers put up a new banner in May as the official name change from Wynn to Encore Boston Harbor was memorialized.

Everett fielded a team that played in a major Pond Hockey Tournament in New Hampshire.

THE TRUMP-DOWN MUST END

Anyone who may have thought that one man could not destroy our country has been in for a rude awakening by the events of the past week.

The partial government shutdown -- the Trump-down, as we refer to it -- that has been engineered solely by President Donald Trump is yet another example of how Trump is destroying America -- not only figuratively, as he has done ever since his inauguration through his espousal and support of un-American values around the world -- but now, he is doing so quite literally.

Whether one agrees with Trump's desire to build a wall along the border with Mexico, there never has been a study of any kind that even remotely has determined how and where it should be built, its cost, and what it might accomplish. In short, Trump is proposing a project that is likely to cost tens of billions of dollars, at a time when those funds can be used for other needs, without any evaluation -- by experts -- of the efficacy of such a barrier. (We would note that previous studies under prior administrations have asserted that a wall along the border will accomplish nothing in terms of deterring illegal immigration.)

In addition, two-thirds of the land along the border is privately-owned. Assuming for the sake of argument that the government is going to take that land by eminent domain -- although it cannot do so for lands owned by Native American tribes -- will be a lengthy and costly process.

On the other hand, there are many other options available to Trump -- many of which are favored by both parties -- that can accomplish the goal of improved border security immediately.

A government shutdown is not some abstract notion. Every day of the Trump-down is causing real damage to our nation -- most notably to our national parks -- and to the 800,000 government workers who do not have a paycheck to support their families, as well as farmers who have been receiving government subsidies -- thanks to Trump's tariff war -- whose funding also will come to a halt.

A sane and rational discussion of a border wall has its place in the normal legislative process. But that discussion is totally separate from the issue of funding the budgets for unrelated government agencies to keep them operational.

The Trump-down is making America look like a banana-republic of the sort that is subject to the whims of a madman-tyrant. It is hard to imagine that our nation can sink any lower.

But with Trump around for two more years, does anyone doubt that we have yet to bottom-out?

A YEAR IN REVIEW AND THE FUTURE AWAITS

LETTER to the Editor

WHAT WAS ONE ACCEPTABLE IS NO LONGER

Dear Editor,

After spending many years in the workforce I have been reflecting on years past, I can remember behaviors of a couple of my ex-coworkers that I accepted and kept quiet about even though I felt uncomfortable, insecure and powerless. These behaviors would come under the umbrella of sexual misconduct. This behavior is perpetrated by people from all walks of life and across the socioeconomic landscape. From working class to white collar workers, From politicians to college professors to the executive office. I knew if I brought this behavior to light to my superior I would be forced to leave my job. It's not in my DNA to bring to light other peoples misbehaviors as I was brought up with a certain code of silence. What it ultimately came down to was my inner strength, tenacity and just plain irish stubbornness to not be beaten. I grew a thick skin, became more aggressive, had a chip on my shoulder and I was left alone. My place of work was a toxic environment for me. Looking back this an incredible challenge nobody should face. I was still presented with with the challenge of working full time and going to school 3 nights a week. As it turned out, I did stick it out and became very good at my job, conscientious and well respected.

Now I ask myself would it be okay with me if my daughter faced the same challenges as I? would I tell her to stand up for herself and bring these things to light in spite of the outcome of her complaints? Would she in fact be ridiculed, outcast, fired and receive angry responses even threats from the community? Will people that support her be ridiculed and attacked and be perceived as evil? Th answer to aforementioned question is yes, I would encourage her to come forward. Do I teach my daughter that code of silence that would actually make her a victim and not a survivor? Things are different now, Right? It's years later and that behavior is no longer acceptable after all.

The last couple of years we have seen this inappropriate and criminal behavior exposed. I myself know 2 people who were accused of sexual misconduct. My first reaction was that this was not true. "He is a good person, no way would he do this, I've known him for years, why is she accusing him of this?" when I did have time to think about this, I thought this could possibly be true because this is so prevalent and is woven into the fabric of our society. As it turned out, much to my chagrin, it was true in both cases.

In closing, this is a systematic problem, it is important for the officials in Everett to continue to take responsibility and provide woman with a safe work environment. Nobody should feel uncomfortable, insecure and frightened in the workplace. In doing so, we can put all our energy toward being a good employee, support ourselves, our families and be a productive member of society.

Everett Resident.

inspections were said to be causing major problems for property owners.

"That's all it is, one apartment at one time," said Marchese.

"The people of Everett deserve some protection," he continued. "The City has run roughshod over this. Whatever it is, it's not treating for an unsanitary or unsafe place. If there's a problem with an apartment, I'm sure the tenant will call long before they see (ISD) walking through it. I've been in this business all my life and my apartments have always been clean...Everybody deserves protection. You come in and look at one apartment and not the whole house. Do we have a blanket policy to say they can come in and look at the whole house? The police don't have as much power as this. They come in with a search warrant and they can't search the whole house...I don't think a guy is going to throw $20,000 to get a clean apartment and have two filthy apartments above and below."

Councilor Capone said the newest version of the ordinance would call for habitability inspections to be limited to the scheduled unit and the common areas. If, for example, a tenant from another unit asked inspectors to look at a minor issue in their unit, inspectors would only be allowed to do that with the approval of the landlord and tenant.

However, he said if there were a major issue affecting serious life safety, inspectors would be able to go into that unit and look into the issue.

"Unfortunately there are good landlords and good tenants and bad landlords and bad tenants," he said. "I hate to see a tenant see this as an opportunity to badger the landlord. If it's a legitimate concern, that supersedes everything here, but if it's more of a nuisance thing, the tenant has the right to have it inspected, but I think it's on them to make their own effort to have that inspection. Just because (an inspector) is in the building, you don't want someone else taking them by the hand and bringing them into their unit."

However, City Attorney Keith Slattery said he didn't think such an ordinance would be enforceable because of the existing state law, which allows tenants to invite anyone into their unit.

"At the same time, it begins to be a slippery slope," he said.

"It seems to me the tenant...has the right to allow entry when inspectors are on the property," he continued. "Requiring that both the tenant and landlord both give consent when inspectors are on eth property would seem to be unenforceable to me...

If an inspector is on the property for another unit ... and a tenant (in another apartment) tells them to come into their unit and look at a problem they have in their unit, an occupier of the space has paramount legal rights."

Fire Chief Tony Carli said he understood the intent of the legislation, to protect landlords from bad tenants, but he also said that small problems can end up being big issues. He said the habitability inspections have been a great tool for the City and the Fire Department.

"If my members are at a property and we're looking for an inspection, we're looking everywhere for fire safety," he said. "We never want to say we were at that house earlier today, or earlier this week, and we could have prevented some incident...If you're saying not to look at smaller things, I don't know if you'll get one of my lieutenants to walk away. We know minor problems can lead to much larger problems..."

With Carli was Fire Capt. Scott Dalrymple, who was injured in the Morris Street fire last summer. That home on Morris Street had been the subject of habitability inspections that uncovered major issues that were corrected just before the fire.

Carli said Dalrymple was a great example of what happens when things aren't checked out in a unit.

"I have Capt. Scott Dalrymple here and he was seriously injured in a fire," he said. "He's evident to what can happen when things aren't maintained in this City...We're not kicking in doors when we do these inspections. We want to make sure everyone is safe...I understand what Councilor Marchese is saying. You don't want to go in and turn a place upside down...We find a lot of the problems through the habitability. It's definitely a tool that's benefitted this City."

A telling problem in the ordinance was just how it would work alongside state law, which is more powerful than a City ordinance. Both Councilors Rosa DiFlorio and Michael McLaughlin wondered if the effort was a waste of time.

"I want to support Councilor Marchese and Councilor Capone, but I'm not sure what really we're trying to change if the state law supersedes our process," said McLaughlin. "I wonder if we're banging our heads against the wall."

The matter was moved to be reviewed by the City Solicitor and taken up once again in the new year.
